Hi, everyone! Welcome back to Inter-Tomas.

Today, I am going to talk to you more about food chains.

Humans are in food chains, too. Yes, that means you! Humans are omnivores. They can eat plants, fish, and meat. Humans usually buy meat instead of hunting it. Humans usually cook meat before eating it. Some humans choose not to eat meat. They are called vegetarians.

This is all for today! See you next time!

Hello, everyone! Welcome back to PR1.

Today, I have the next part of the conversation about what people are good at. Take a listen:

So, you're not good at sports... what about maths? Are you good at maths?

Yes. I feel like I'm bragging when I say that, but I enjoy math. And I'm in junior high school now, and I do well in it. I think up to high school level math, I'm good. What about you, Tomas?

Yeah, the same. I think I'm quite good at math. I enjoyed it in elementary school, but I don't quite like it now. I sometimes help my sister with her maths homework. So, yeah... I think I'm not bad, but it's not my favourite subject anymore.

Lucky her!

Well, that's all for today, and we'll see you in class. Bye-bye!

Hey, guys! How are you doing?

Hope you're all still staying healthy and safe.

Another decision about the impending Olympics was made recently and- well, take a listen to this:

After a lengthy period of indecision, organizers announced June 21st that spectators during the Tokyo Olympic Games will be limited to 10,000 fans per venue – unless the coronavirus situation worsens around the start of the Olympics on July 23rd. The announcement came after months of back and forth between organizers, officials, experts, and the public over the scale and scope of the once-postponed global sporting event.

“As the spectator cap has been decided, we have collected the last piece of the puzzle. I think the framework of the stage has been completed,” the president of the Tokyo Organizing Committee said in a news conference.

Hmm. See, I was under the impression that if the Olympics did go ahead, they would be held without spectators. But now they're planning to fill the stadiums up to at least half capacity, which still feels a little problematic. Not only that, I read that this number doesn't even include students who would be attending on school collaboration visits, and IOC members and other official people, and so this number may end up being a lot higher than 10,000. Hmm, I think it all still feels like a bit of a mess, but let me know what you think, okay?

Alright, guys, well, until next time – and as always – study hard, stay safe, and I'll see you soon.
