

Dictation Contest (PRJr, 初級) No. 354

Hello everyone! Welcome back to PRJr. Today, I want to tell you about the bug in the bottle. Charles found a glass bottle. It was a pretty glass bottle. It was dark green. He shook the bottle. Something came out of the bottle. It landed on the ground. It was a bug. Charles put the bottle back on the ground. The bug crawled back into the bottle. Well, that's all for today and I'll see you next time. Bye-bye!

Dictation Contest (PR 1, 中級) No. 354

Hi, this is PR1.

Do you think you are healthy? My health is pretty good. There are three reasons for this. First, I always try to get enough exercise. I go to the gym for workouts in a few times a week. And I go jogging every morning. I also try to walk as much as possible. Second, I watch what I eat and drink. I try to eat healthy foods that have a lot of vitamins and minerals. I avoid eating too much fat. Finally, I always try to get seven or eight hours of sleep. Sometimes this is difficult because I'm busy. But if I get too little sleep one day, I sleep a little extra the next day. My body is important to me so I take good care of it.

See you later.

Dictation Contest (PR2 上級) No. 352

Hello, everyone. Welcome back to PR2. Today, I will be telling you about vacation. Let's begin.

Almost a third of Americans willingly exaggerate their vacations on social media by editing their photos. They make it appear that they are visiting or staying in more luxurious places than they really are. For example, the altered photos may show them standing in front of a famous hotel that they are not really staying in or sitting on an empty-looking beach that is actually crowded but has been strategically angled to cut out the crowds.

However, these exaggerations may be well justified. Surveys reveal that traveling can be very costly for Americans. Americans spend an average of 10% of their incomes on trips and almost three quarters of them borrow money for that purpose. In fact, the results of a survey showed that a similar percent of travelers would rather reduce everyday spending on items like food and entertainment than cut back on travel costs. This is also borne out in another survey, which showed that vacationers are willing to pay back their vacations debts over an average of 6 months, through cutbacks on daily living expenses. All in all, for Americans, traveling cheaply does not impress one's friends. If people cannot afford to go on luxurious trips, they may have to compromise by faking them on social media.

Well, that is it for today. See you next time. Bye.
