Dictation Contest (PR 1, 中級) No. 512

Hello, everyone! Welcome to PR1.

Today, I will be talking about job hopping. Let's begin.

A LinkedIn survey found that if you are less than 32 years old, you are likely to change jobs at least 4 times before you reach that age. By 2001, only half of the workforce in the UK had been in continuous employment for a period longer than 4 years. Yet another survey by staffing for Robert Hoff, over 60% of workers favor what is known as job hopping, with 75% of employees under 34 believing in the benefits of job hopping. A single career for life used to mean climbing the corporate ladder, stability in income, and to a certain degree, specialization. However, in an age of rapid technological advancement. How work is organized and how people feel about it have clearly changed.

This it for today. See you!

Dictation Contest (PR2 上級) No. 512

Hello! Welcome back to PR2! Today's movie is the continuation of the text about training dogs! However, this part focuses on self-interest. Let's get started.

Researchers find that perceived self-interest, the rewards one believes are at stake, is the most significant factor in predicting dedication and satisfaction toward work. It accounts for about 75 percent of personal motivation toward accomplishment.

What is the difference between people who willingly take work home with them on the weekends and people who laugh at that idea? What is the difference between people who work hard all day and people who do as little work as they can possibly get away with? What is the difference between people who sign up for night school classes and those who can't imagine going back to school? What is the difference between the most driven and the laziest person? The answer is: self-interest.

We all do what we do because of self-interest, that is to say, what we think it's best for us. Those who work hard do so because they believe there is a reward awaiting them that not only justifies their efforts but also demands their dedication. Remind yourself of the value of the things you want, and the cost to your effort will not feel as great.

That's all for today! See you next time. Bye, bye!
